Abstract

This study investigates the role of post-divorce mut'ah (a form of consolatory gift from husband to wife) in reinforcing gender hierarchies within the religious court system in Indonesia. The primary aim is to explore how mut'ah is conceptualized, negotiated, and decided upon in courtrooms, and how this process reflects broader socio-religious power relations between men and women in post-divorce contexts. Employing a qualitative research method, this study is based on in-depth interviews with judges, divorced women, and legal advocates in three religious courts across Java and Sumatra. In addition, courtroom observations and analysis of case documents were conducted to understand how mut'ah claims are framed and adjudicated. The findings indicate that although mut'ah is formally recognized under Islamic legal doctrine and Indonesian religious court jurisprudence, its implementation remains inconsistent and highly gendered. Judges often interpret mut'ah as non-obligatory and discretionary, resulting in many divorced women being denied this right, especially in cases where the woman is perceived as "at fault." The courtroom discourse often reaffirms patriarchal norms, positioning women as dependent and less entitled to post-divorce economic justice. The study concludes that rather than serving as a mechanism of gender equity or compensation, mut'ah in practice tends to reproduce gendered power imbalances. Academically, this research contributes to the fields of Islamic legal studies, gender and law, and socio-legal anthropology by highlighting how legal institutions mediate religious interpretations in ways that reinforce structural inequalities, particularly in the realm of family and marital dissolution in contemporary Muslim societies.

Abstrak

Penelitian ini mengkaji peran mut'ah pasca-cerai (pemberian hibah penghibur dari suami kepada istri) dalam memperkuat hierarki gender di dalam praktik peradilan agama di Indonesia. Tujuan utama penelitian ini adalah untuk mengeksplorasi bagaimana mut'ah dikonsepkan, dinegosiasikan, dan diputuskan di ruang sidang, serta bagaimana proses tersebut mencerminkan relasi kekuasaan sosial-keagamaan antara laki-laki dan perempuan dalam konteks pasca-perceraian. Dengan menggunakan metode kualitatif, penelitian ini didasarkan pada wawancara mendalam dengan hakim, perempuan yang telah bercerai, dan para pendamping hukum di tiga pengadilan agama di wilayah Jawa dan Sumatra. Selain itu, dilakukan observasi persidangan dan analisis dokumen perkara untuk memahami bagaimana klaim mut'ah dirumuskan dan diputuskan. Temuan menunjukkan bahwa meskipun mut'ah secara formal diakui dalam doktrin hukum Islam dan yurisprudensi pengadilan agama di Indonesia, penerapannya bersifat tidak konsisten dan sangat berperspektif gender. Para hakim sering memaknai mut'ah sebagai sesuatu yang tidak wajib dan bersifat diskresioner, sehingga banyak perempuan tidak memperoleh hak tersebut, terutama jika dianggap sebagai pihak yang "bersalah" dalam perceraian. Diskursus di ruang sidang kerap mereproduksi norma-norma patriarkal, yang memosisikan perempuan sebagai pihak yang bergantung dan kurang berhak atas keadilan ekonomi pasca-perceraian. Penelitian ini menyimpulkan bahwa alih-alih menjadi mekanisme keadilan gender atau kompensasi, praktik mut'ah justru cenderung mereproduksi ketimpangan relasi kuasa berbasis gender. Secara akademik, studi ini memberikan kontribusi pada bidang studi hukum Islam, gender dan hukum, serta antropologi sosial-hukum dengan menyoroti bagaimana institusi hukum menengahi tafsir keagamaan yang memperkuat ketimpangan struktural, khususnya dalam ranah keluarga dan perceraian di masyarakat Muslim kontemporer.

INTRDUCTION

In the context of Islamic divorce (Saragih, Pulungan, & Budhiawan, 2022), nafkah mut'ah is not merely a material provision from a former husband to his former wife; it embodies a moral and social responsibility grounded in the Islamic principles of justice and humanity. This concept becomes increasingly significant as it reflects Islam's broader perspective on gender justice within marital and post – marital relationships. Although Islam permits divorce as a last resort, it also mandates that divorce be carried out with ethical responsibility and adequate protection for the more vulnerable party—typically, the woman (Muhazir, Azwir, & Zubir, 2024). In many cases, divorced women face the risk of losing economic and social security, especially when they lack independent income. Therefore, the provision of mut'ah serves as both compensation and recognition of the wife's contributions during the marriage. However, in the practice of Indonesia's religious courts, the implementation of nafkah mut'ah often encounters conceptual and procedural obstacles. There is a prevailing tendency to treat mut'ah as a non – obligatory, symbolic act, despite its normative function as a form of legal protection for women post – divorce. Such perspectives reveal a tension between Islamic legal norms, judicial practices, and deeply entrenched patriarchal social constructions.

The interpretation and application of mut'ah within Indonesia's religious court system illustrate how religious norms are produced and negotiated in legal arenas shaped by power relations and social interests (Qohar, Zaki, Faizal, & Rofi'i, 2022). In numerous cases, judges' decisions to grant or deny mut'ah are influenced by subjective moral assessments, particularly regarding the perceived fault of the wife in the divorce process. This undermines the objectivity and equity expected in legal reasoning. Such practices demonstrate that Islamic law does not operate in a vacuum but is embedded within broader socio – cultural and political contexts (Yuni & Haries, 2024). Thus, studies on mut'ah must go beyond normative legal analysis and engage in socio – legal discourse to uncover how Islamic law is articulated and applied within the lived realities of Muslim societies. From this broader lens, mut'ah becomes a critical indicator of gender justice in Islamic legal frameworks and a reflection of the judicial system's commitment to equality. Accordingly, this research contributes not only to legal – normative debates but also invites critical reflection on the practical dynamics of Islamic law and its implications for the dignity and well – being of women as legal subjects.

The provision of mut'ah in post – divorce Islamic family law offers a critical entry point for understanding how Islamic values can coexist and interact with diverse cultural and social norms across Muslim societies (Ideham, 2022). As a form of financial consolation granted to a woman after divorce, mut'ah is rooted in Islamic ethical and legal traditions emphasizing justice, compassion, and social responsibility. However, the interpretation and implementation of this right are not monolithic; they vary across different socio – cultural settings, legal institutions, and even individual judges' perspectives. In the Indonesian context, the practice of mut'ah reflects the broader negotiation between Islamic jurisprudence and local adat (customary) values, legal pluralism, and evolving gender norms. Examining how mut'ah is understood and practiced in religious courts reveals the dynamic interplay between normative Islamic law and the lived realities of Muslim communities undergoing socio–economic transformation (Davies, 2015). This study emphasizes the importance of a contextualized and historically grounded understanding of mut'ah, arguing that its relevance extends beyond doctrinal legalism and must be evaluated within the broader spectrum of societal change, local customs, gender relations, and institutional capacities.

This article aims to provide an in–depth legal, theological, and socio–cultural analysis of the concept of nafkah mut'ah as a moral and legal obligation of a former husband toward his former wife. The analysis encompasses a comprehensive review of classical Islamic jurisprudence, contemporary legal interpretations, and statutory regulations within Indonesia's religious court system. Special attention is given to how mut'ah is codified in Indonesian positive law, including its alignment with Islamic principles and the extent to which it is effectively implemented in practice. Furthermore, the article explores how the provision of mut'ah can positively influence the post–divorce well–being of women, particularly in terms of economic resilience and psychological recovery, thereby affirming the ethical goals (maqāṣid al-sharī'ah) of protecting dignity, welfare, and justice. Through qualitative case studies and legal textual analysis, the article reveals the practical challenges and opportunities inherent in the application of mut'ah, such as judicial discretion, gendered interpretations, and institutional inconsistencies. Ultimately, the study advocates for a more inclusive and gender–sensitive legal framework that not only honors the normative intent of Islamic law but also supports the sustainable integration of religious values with contemporary human rights and gender equity standards. The broader implications of this research extend to the global Muslim community by offering a framework for rethinking post–divorce justice in ways that are faithful to Islamic legal heritage while also responsive to modern–day challenges.

METHODS

This research employed a qualitative empirical legal approach with a socio–legal framework to investigate the interpretation and implementation of nafkah mut'ah in Indonesia's religious courts. The study integrates doctrinal legal analysis—examining the normative foundations of mut'ah in classical Islamic jurisprudence and Indonesian statutory law—with an empirical inquiry into how these norms are applied in practice. Three methodological approaches were combined: the legislative approach to analyze relevant laws and regulations (including the Compilation of Islamic Law and Marriage Law No. 1 of 1974); the case approach to review selected court decisions on divorce–related mut'ah claims; and the sociological approach to explore the lived experiences and perceptions of the actors involved. The research population consisted of religious court judges, legal practitioners, former litigants (particularly divorced women), and court officials in three religious courts located in urban and semi–urban areas of Java and Sumatra. Purposive sampling was employed to ensure the inclusion of key informants with direct involvement in or knowledge of mut'ah cases. The researcher was directly present in the field to conduct data collection over a period of three months, from January to March 2024, enabling the development of contextual understanding through prolonged engagement and active observation in court settings.

Data collection techniques included in–depth semi–structured interviews, courtroom observations, and document analysis of case files and legal texts. Interviews were conducted with 15 informants, including 6 judges, 3 legal aid officers, 4 divorced women who had petitioned for mut'ah, and 2 court clerks, with interview guides tailored to their respective roles. Observational data focused on courtroom dynamics during divorce proceedings, particularly concerning the adjudication of mut'ah claims. Additionally, secondary data were gathered from legal literature, doctrinal commentaries, and previous research studies. Instrument development followed a flexible design, allowing iterative refinement during the fieldwork based on emergent findings. The data were analyzed using thematic content analysis, supported by NVivo software for systematic coding and categorization. To ensure the validity and reliability of findings, the study employed triangulation across data sources (interviews, documents, and observations) and informant types, as well as cross – checking interpretations with expert opinions from Islamic family law scholars. This methodological rigor was crucial to ensure that the research findings are not only grounded in normative Islamic legal theory but also reflective of the socio – legal realities experienced in contemporary Indonesian Muslim communities.

RESULT AND DISCUSSION

RESULT

In the current practice of Indonesia's religious courts, mut'ah—a consolatory gift provided by a former husband to his ex – wife following divorce—is largely interpreted as a discretionary act rather than a binding legal obligation. This interpretation significantly influences the way mut'ah is adjudicated, reducing its function from a right rooted in Islamic legal ethics to a benevolent gesture subject to the subjective inclinations of individual judges. The lack of formal procedural guidelines or statutory enforcement mechanisms surrounding mut'ah in the Indonesian religious legal system exacerbates this inconsistency, rendering post – divorce economic justice for women unreliable and often inaccessible. Although mut'ah is recognized within both classical Islamic jurisprudence and Indonesia's Kompilasi Hukum Islam (Compilation of Islamic Law), its implementation is marginalized by a dominant legal culture that privileges judicial discretion over codified gender justice.

A second critical pattern that emerges in the courtroom treatment of mut'ah is the systematic exclusion of women who initiate divorce (cerai gugat) from eligibility to claim it. This practice—although not explicitly mandated in any Islamic doctrinal source—has become entrenched in judicial reasoning, effectively punishing women who seek to leave marital relationships, regardless of the legitimacy or necessity of their reasons. Religious court judges frequently invoke notions of male authority and household leadership to justify this exclusion, implicitly framing male – initiated divorce (talak) as the normative and religiously appropriate route to marital termination. The consequences of this discriminatory logic are far – reaching: women who may be escaping abusive, negligent, or otherwise harmful marriages are not only deprived of ongoing economic support but are also denied recognition of their social and psychological suffering through the denial of mut'ah.

A further dimension of gendered injustice is evident in the moral assessments that judges often apply to female claimants of mut'ah. Rather than treating mut'ah as a procedural right tied to the termination of marriage, many judges assess the woman's character, obedience, and perceived moral conduct during the marriage as a condition for granting the claim. Women perceived as disobedient, morally compromised, or as contributors to marital breakdown are frequently denied mut'ah, regardless of the legal merits of their case. This moralizing judicial discourse reflects entrenched gender norms that valorize female submissiveness and penalize female autonomy, particularly in the realm of family and sexual relations (Djawas, Eriyanti, Yulia, & Fauzan, 2023). The result is a deeply subjective and patriarchal adjudication process in which women must not only prove their legal eligibility for mut'ah, but also perform an idealized form of femininity to gain judicial sympathy. This practice effectively places the burden of marital failure on women and disregards structural and interpersonal dynamics—such as emotional neglect or economic control—that often remain invisible in legal proceedings.

Despite the formal inclusion of mut'ah in Indonesia's Kompilasi Hukum Islam (KHI), the legal infrastructure surrounding its implementation remains underdeveloped (Kaleta & Mryz, 2023). There is a conspicuous absence of procedural guidelines, technical protocols, or standardized benchmarks for assessing and adjudicating mut'ah claims in the religious courts. This institutional gap has led to a high degree of inconsistency in verdicts, with rulings varying significantly across jurisdictions, even in cases with similar facts and legal arguments. Judges are often left to rely on personal interpretation, which is shaped by their socio-religious background, training, and gender attitudes. The resulting legal unpredictability weakens the credibility and authority of religious court rulings and undermines women's trust in the judicial process. The absence of a coherent regulatory framework also opens up space for discretionary bias, especially when dealing with sensitive gender-related issues. In this vacuum of operational clarity, women's access to mut'ah becomes less about the strength of their legal argument and more about the attitudes of individual judges, making it a justice mechanism that is both unstable and structurally fragile.

The challenge of accessing mut'ah is further compounded by widespread legal illiteracy among women plaintiffs, particularly those from rural or socioeconomically disadvantaged backgrounds (Fitriani & Aziz, 2019). Many women are unaware that mut'ah is even a potential right available to them upon divorce, let alone the procedural requirements or timing necessary to claim it effectively. In many instances observed during this research, women either failed to raise the issue of mut'ah during the court proceedings or only learned of its relevance after the case had been concluded, leaving them with no viable path to pursue a claim retroactively. This lack of awareness is not merely a matter of individual ignorance, but rather reflects systemic failures in legal education, gender-sensitive outreach, and state-supported advocacy (Faizal, Qohar, Wahid, & Rofi'i, 2024). Moreover, legal aid services, when available, often do not prioritize mut'ah claims due to their perceived non-essential nature compared to matters like child custody or division of marital assets. Consequently, even when mut'ah is codified in Islamic legal frameworks, it remains practically invisible for many women who could benefit from it most.

A further barrier to the effective realization of mut'ah lies in the gendered power dynamics embedded within the negotiation process itself. Because the legal culture and courtroom discourse often frame mut'ah not as a right but as a "gift," the male party—typically the former husband—is discursively and institutionally positioned as the benefactor. This framing transforms what should be a legal entitlement into a voluntary, transactional arrangement, reinforcing the notion that any financial concession from the man is an act of generosity rather than justice. As a result, the woman's bargaining power in court is significantly diminished (Turatmiyah, Syaifuddin, Yahanan, Febrian, & Novera, 2019), particularly when she is economically dependent or lacks access to legal representation. The discourse of male benevolence and female gratitude not only erodes the normative function of Islamic legal principles meant to ensure equity but also perpetuates a gendered hierarchy in which men control both the legal outcome and its moral narrative. This dynamic undermines the compensatory essence of mut'ah and re-inscribes patriarchal norms under the guise of religious adjudication.

Even in rare instances where judges do rule in favor of awarding mut'ah, the enforceability of these decisions remains highly problematic (Badri et al., 2025). Religious courts in Indonesia lack robust mechanisms to compel compliance with financial rulings, particularly when the former husband refuses to pay or conceals assets. There is no centralized enforcement body or procedural follow-up system to ensure that court-ordered mut'ah is actually delivered to the ex-wife (Aeby, Cottier, Widmer, & Sahdeva, 2024). Women often exit the courtroom with a favorable ruling but receive no material benefit (Andri, Dewilde, & Muffels, 2019), rendering the judgment symbolic rather than transformative. This gap between legal recognition and actual enforcement starkly illustrates the limitations of the religious court system in delivering substantive justice to women. The absence of effective enforcement mechanisms also signals a broader institutional neglect of gendered economic rights, prioritizing procedural completion over meaningful outcomes (Dewi, 2020). Without state-backed execution strategies, such as asset seizure, wage garnishment, or legal penalties for non-compliance, the promise of mut'ah remains unfulfilled. Strengthening post-verdict enforcement frameworks, including collaboration with civil courts or financial institutions, is essential if mut'ah is to serve as more than a rhetorical affirmation of women's rights in post-divorce contexts.

DISCUSSION

The mere codification of mut'ah within Indonesia's positive legal framework, as articulated in the Kompilasi Hukum Islam (KHI), does not inherently guarantee the realization of substantive justice for women undergoing divorce. While its legal recognition is symbolically significant, in practice, the protection it offers is often undermined by the patriarchal interpretations adopted by many religious court judges. These interpretations are not value-neutral; rather (Ridgway, 2024), they are shaped by socio-religious assumptions about gender roles, morality, and the appropriate post-divorce conduct of women (Azhari & Saleh, 2024). Judicial discretion—ostensibly meant to tailor justice to individual cases—has instead become a conduit for the reinforcement of gender hierarchies, particularly when mut'ah is perceived as a moral reward rather than a compensatory right. This undermines the principle of equality before the law (Sanusi, Iman, Baihaki, & Farhan, 2023), rendering the normative existence of mut'ah ineffective for many divorced women.

Further exacerbating this issue is the gender-biased legal logic embedded in the interpretation of who qualifies for mut'ah. Most religious courts in Indonesia limit the right to mut'ah to cases initiated by male spouses through cerai talak (repudiation), effectively excluding women who file for divorce through cerai gugat (petition for divorce) from receiving this form of compensation (Mansari & Moriyanti, 2019). This restrictive interpretation reveals a deep-seated asymmetry in how legal institutions conceptualize agency and culpability in divorce proceedings. The presumption appears to be that women who initiate divorce have voluntarily forfeited their entitlement to post-marital support, as if their exercise of legal agency negates the economic and emotional vulnerability that follows marital dissolution. Such reasoning neglects the myriad legitimate grounds—ranging from domestic violence to abandonment—under which women may seek to dissolve a marriage, and it unjustly penalizes them for pursuing justice through the formal legal system (Nikparvar, Stith, Dehghani, & Liang, 2021). By narrowing the eligibility criteria for mut'ah, the judiciary constructs a normative hierarchy that privileges male grievances and marginalizes female suffering.

Perhaps most fundamentally, the prevailing judicial practices surrounding mut'ah in Indonesia deviate from the Qur'anic vision of post – divorce justice. In Surah Al – Baqarah (2:241), mut'ah is explicitly prescribed as a provision of kindness and dignity for all divorced women, regardless of the initiator of the separation. The Qur'an frames mut'ah not as a punitive or reward – based measure, but as an ethical obligation grounded in compassion, fairness (Wardi, 2019), and the preservation of human dignity after the rupture of marital bonds. Yet the courts' selective application of mut'ah—contingent on legal technicalities, moral judgments, and patriarchal discretion—betrays this divine mandate. The emphasis on obedience, female fault (Rohayati et al., 2025), or male magnanimity shifts the focus away from justice to moral surveillance, thereby distorting the Qur'anic call for equitable treatment. This misalignment between scriptural values and judicial practice reflects a troubling disjunction in contemporary Islamic legal implementation (Ciacci, 2023), wherein the textual principles of mercy and justice are subordinated to patriarchal control and institutional rigidity.

Religious court judges in Indonesia hold dual roles as both legal and religious authorities, positioning them as powerful agents in shaping the normative landscape of post – divorce gender relations. Their interpretations of mut'ah are rarely value – neutral; rather, they are infused with cultural and moral assumptions that often reinforce gender hierarchies rather than challenge them. The courtroom becomes not merely a site for the adjudication of legal claims but also a platform for moral instruction, where judges perform their role as guardians of religious orthodoxy and social order. In this setting, the authority to interpret Islamic law becomes a form of cultural power, enabling judges to project patriarchal norms under the guise of religious legitimacy. Consequently, the discretionary nature of mut'ah adjudication often allows judges to operationalize cultural biases—such as the ideal of female obedience or male financial superiority—into binding legal outcomes. This power asymmetry is not only judicial but epistemological, as male – centered interpretations dominate the discourse and leave little space for alternative hermeneutics that might center women's lived experiences and moral agency.

This study reveals a significant disjunction between Islamic legal texts and their practical application in Indonesia's religious courts (Mahmud, 2021). While classical and contemporary Islamic jurisprudence acknowledge mut'ah as a legitimate right for divorced women, this doctrinal clarity is frequently obscured or reinterpreted in localized judicial contexts (Fadil, Mazidah, & Mahmudi, 2024). The gap between normative ideals and real – world implementation illustrates how legal meaning is never fixed solely by textual sources but is continuously reshaped by social, cultural, and institutional contexts. Judges often interpret legal texts through the lens of prevailing social norms, including patriarchal attitudes toward marriage, gender roles, and morality. As a result, Islamic legal provisions that could potentially promote gender justice are diluted or redirected to serve conservative cultural expectations. The invocation of religious legitimacy in court decisions thus becomes a vehicle for sustaining traditional gender orders rather than promoting transformative justice. This interpretive slippage between text and practice is not accidental but structural—it reflects the embeddedness of religious courts within broader socio – cultural ecosystems that resist gender egalitarianism.

The implications of this research extend beyond the Indonesian context, offering critical insights for broader debates on Islamic legal reform in Muslim – majority societies worldwide (Saraireh, 2021). It underscores that legislative change alone is insufficient to produce substantive gender justice if not accompanied by institutional and epistemological transformation (Fachrunisa, Qamaria, & Hanani, 2023). The persistence of gender – biased interpretations in the courtroom—even in the presence of codified rights—demonstrates how deeply entrenched patriarchal logics are within both legal discourse and judicial practice. For reform – minded actors in the Muslim world, this case study serves as a cautionary tale: without addressing the interpretive authority of judges and the sociocultural logics they bring into the courtroom, even the most progressive legal texts can be rendered ineffectual. Legal change must therefore be holistic, targeting not only the content of laws but also the interpretive infrastructures—legal education, religious authority structures, judicial training—that mediate between text and practice.

Recommendation of this study advocates for a reimagining of mut'ah through the lens of Islamic ethical principles, particularly those emphasizing 'adl (justice), rahmah (compassion), and karamah (dignity). Rather than being conceptualized as a discretionary gift granted by a benevolent ex – husband, mut'ah should be recognized as a rightful entitlement that affirms the moral and economic dignity of women after divorce (Neyland, 2020). This shift in perspective requires moving beyond procedural legality and embracing a normative framework grounded in Islamic ethics (Suadi, Candra, Al Hasan, & Gumilar, 2024). Legal scholars, activists, and judicial authorities must collaborate to cultivate jurisprudential discourses that foreground women's rights as integral to Islamic justice, rather than peripheral or conditional (Fitriyati, Duski Ibrahim, Firman Muntaqo, & KN Shofyan Hasan, 2025). Such an approach does not necessitate abandoning religious tradition but rather demands a more faithful return to its ethical foundations (Leopold & Kalmijn, 2024). By advocating for a rights – based and ethically rooted understanding of mut'ah, this study contributes to a growing movement within Islamic legal thought that seeks to align legal practice with the core values of gender equity and social justice, making it a vital reference point for both national and global efforts toward Islamic legal reform.

CONCLUSION

This study has revealed that the adjudication of mut'ah in Indonesia's religious courts reflects and reproduces deeply entrenched gender hierarchies under the guise of Islamic jurisprudence. While mut'ah is doctrinally recognized as a mechanism of post – divorce support for women, the legal and institutional frameworks that govern its implementation remain highly discretionary, inconsistent, and patriarchal in practice. The research demonstrates that women, particularly those filing for divorce (cerai gugat), are routinely denied access to mut'ah on the basis of gender – biased interpretations that privilege male economic authority and moral judgment. Judges' reliance on extra – legal moral criteria—such as obedience, fault, and marital behavior—further erodes the legitimacy of mut'ah as a legal right and reduces it to a form of charitable concession. Additionally, the absence of detailed procedural guidelines and enforcement mechanisms, compounded by women's limited legal literacy, significantly weakens the operationalization of this legal provision. These dynamics underscore the broader finding that religious courts are not neutral arbiters of Islamic law but are instead culturally situated institutions where gender, power, and religious authority intersect to shape legal outcomes in ways that often undermine women's rights.

The implications of these findings extend beyond national boundaries and contribute to global discourses on Islamic legal reform, gender justice, and the sociology of law. Theoretically, the study offers a critical lens on how religious texts are interpreted and institutionalized in legal practice, revealing the disconnect between normative Islamic principles—rooted in justice and compassion—and their local implementation. Practically, it highlights the urgent need for reforms that move beyond legislative change and address the interpretive structures and institutional actors that mediate the meaning and application of Islamic legal norms. This includes improving judicial training to promote gender-sensitive interpretations, enhancing procedural clarity in mut'ah adjudication, and increasing public legal awareness—especially among women. While the study provides rich empirical insights, it is limited by its geographical scope and the absence of perspectives from male litigants and broader community stakeholders, which could offer a more holistic understanding of courtroom dynamics. Future research should adopt comparative, multi-sited approaches across different Muslim-majority jurisdictions to explore how mut'ah and other post-divorce rights are interpreted, resisted, or transformed in varying socio-legal contexts. By situating mut'ah within ongoing debates on Islamic legal ethics and structural gender reform, this study not only contributes to academic scholarship but also offers a normative pathway for rethinking Islamic family law in ways that center women's rights and dignity as fundamental, not optional.
